Consider the national attitude toward the arts - how the American people react to and support the art, music, theatre and combinations which surround them. Where do the present attitudes stem from and will they continue in the same manner with future generations?

How many plays and concerts does the average American attend per year? How many good cinemas or record counters does a U.S. citizen support? How often has an average American ever been to an art show?

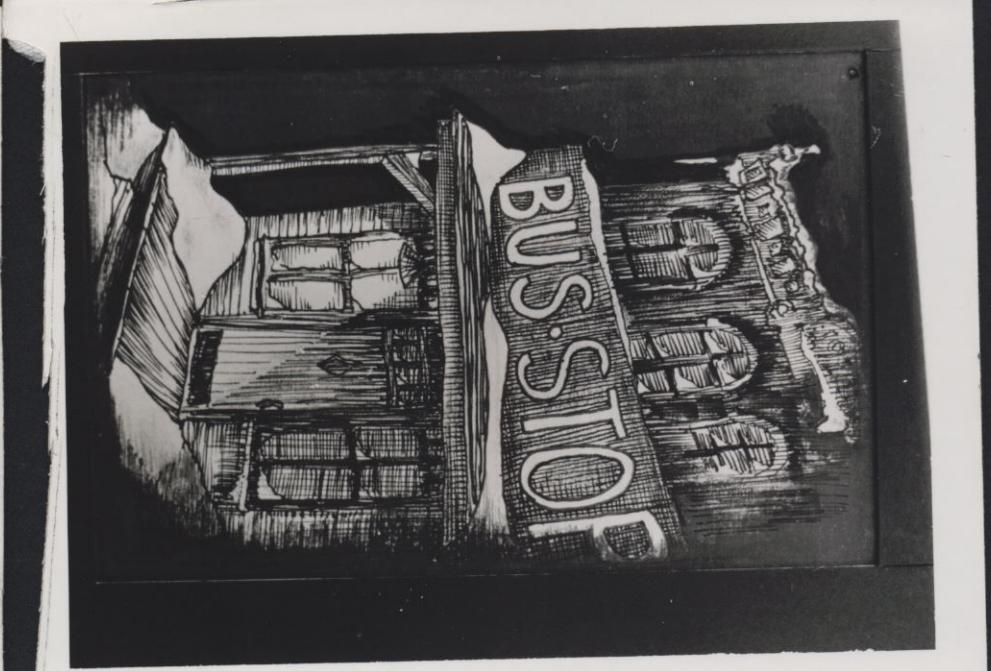

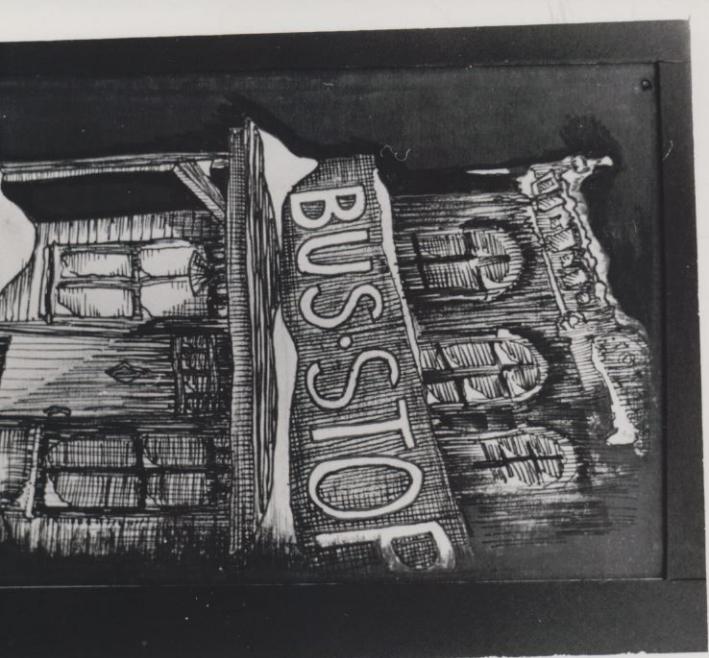

Are the statistical answers to the above any reflection upon how a child grows up in this country and the atmosphere which is about him? If so, something may be done, if approached correctly, to make some changes in our future adults and patrons of the arts.

Annually College Players make efforts to do just that. In the fall semester Storybook Theatre goes on the road in Clinton County, visiting 12 elementary schools in the Keystone Central School District. In the Spring semester these same kindergarden through sixth graders "go on the road" to LHSC for a full length Childrens Theatre production at Price Auditorium.

December 1-8, director Kim Coon and his traveling troupe of actors will visit two schools a day with their storybook script, "The Brave Little Tailor." The group will entertain and delight youngsters as they improvisationally unravel their tale with the help of the imaginative audiences which will surround them on the floors of local gyms and all-purpose rooms. Kimbo's actors will work with some props and costumes but will leave most of these items and all of the scenery to the clever minds of the kids.

"Opening Night" salutes this and efforts like it and would hope to see more of this type of interest in our future from all phases of the arts, not just for the sake of attempting to build a new audience but in anticipation of enhancing a lasting healthy imagination and sense of creativity in our young which seems either have never existed or has been dulled in so many of our adults.
